“ Facebook deserves a lot of ciitrcism, but certainly not over this. When dealing with companies that handle money for you (for example Google Checkout or Paypal) it is extremely common to see a test charge of less than $2.00 made so that the company can verify that the account information is correct. The charge is cancelled once they determine that your account information is correct and your account is active. You should have seen this many times before if you have used other payment services and you have agreed to this as this is mentioned in Facebook's terms of service.
